The Birth Of Armored Warfare

The concept of armored warfare was first proposed by British military thinkers in the early 20th century. However, it was not until the outbreak of the First World War that the idea was put into practice.

In 1916, the British Army formed the first experimental tank battalion. These early tanks were crude and unreliable, but they proved to be surprisingly effective in combat. By the end of the war, the British Army had over 2,000 tanks in service.

Armored Units In Action

The armored units of the Royal Army saw action on all fronts of the First World War. They fought in the trenches of France and Belgium, in the deserts of the Middle East, and in the mountains of Italy.

Tanks proved to be particularly effective in breaking through enemy lines and supporting infantry attacks. They also played a vital role in the final Allied offensive that led to the Armistice in 1918.

The Armistice And Beyond

The Armistice of 11 November 1918 marked the end of the First World War. The armored units of the Royal Army had played a significant role in the Allied victory.

After the war, the British Army continued to develop its armored forces. Tanks became an essential part of the British military, and they played a major role in the Second World War.
